Twilight of Empire: The Tragedy at Mayerling and the End of the Habsburgs. Written by Greg King Penny Wilson. Review by Bethany Latham. The murder-suicide at Mayerling was an event that ripped a family, an empire, and eventually the entire world apart. Archduke Franz Ferdinand, whose assassination touched off World War I, would never have been heir to the Austro-Hungarian throne had his cousin, Crown Prince Rudolf, not died at the imperial hunting lodge in 1889.

Twilight of Empire: The Tragedy at Mayerling and the End of the Habsburgs, the new book by Greg King and Penny Wilson set to be released on November 14, explores Rudolf's actions at his hunting lodge of Mayerling and reconstructs the end of the young prince's tragic life. However, the authors ultimately exhume Rudolf's corpse in a literary reenactment of the infamous Cadaver Synod, in which Pope Stephen VII propped up the rotten bulk of Pope Formosus's dead body for a parody of a trial.

Review of "Twilight of Empire: The Tragedy at Mayerling ...

A study of the many mysteries surrounding the death of Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria-Hungary and his mistress. The conventional story holds that the couple was at Mayerling, Rudolf's hunting lodge, where he shot her, then sat with her body for hours before shooting himself. A story of love denied and lovers united forever in death?

TWILIGHT OF EMPIRE by Greg King , Penny Wilson | Kirkus ...

Twilight of Empire is divided into four sections. The first details Crown Prince Rudolf's miserable childhood and early adult years. Deprived of contact with either parent and forced through an unimaginative and harsh education, he grew up to be intelligent but flighty.
